A Mother's Devotion.

All the way through a mau's life, be it consumed like a beautiful fabric in unboly passion, or held aloft like St. George's banner, undefiled in the battle of life, his mother stands by him to the last. If he is successful, she is proud; if he is cast down, she is pitiful; if he is wicked, she excuses him: if he dies young, her hope is buried in his grave, and she never ceases to dream of what her darling might have been. Others may be proud of him, but she always sits in the front row with those who appland, and catches the splendor of his achievements before it is more to other eyes than light reflected from afar, or the noise of wings that tarry in its coming. She anticipates his triumphs and antedates his victories. There is an "I told you so" in her proud eyes long before men hand in the verdict of his greatness, and all his schievements are but the prophecies of her loving dreams. And when she dies, when the fluttering breath has expended itself in the loosened their clasp, never before removed since his helpless baby days, when the patient, yearning eyes have withdrawn their gaze to look their first look on God, what loss can overtake a man's life like this? The dove that brooded over the household nest and kept every purseling in the shadow of her wings, has winged her flight to heaven. The everlasting love that no unfaith, nor sin, nor gratitude could chill or destroy, bas vanished like the sun from out of the sky, leaving only a few faint stars and a wan and chilly moon to fill its place.
